There are many interactive digital installations. With sensors, images change in response to the viewers' movements.

For example, when you touch flowers projected on the walls or floor, the petals scatter. When you stand . still, flowers gradually bloom around you. In another artwork, you draw a picture of a fish on paper and scan it, then the fish starts swimming in a virtual aquarium. If you touch the fish, it swims away. You can even feed the fish!

A Digital Art Museum in Paris

For some young people, museums have a stuffy image. But a digital art museum opened in Paris, France, in 2018 is attracting people from around the world. It occupies an old foundry that was built in 1835. With a huge floorspace and walls that are ten meters high, famous paintings are enlarged.

• People can enjoy looking at them while listening to music.

Rotating exhibitions of well-known artists have included Klimt, van Gogh, Monet and Chagall. Japanese ukiyoe, or woodblock prints, have also been on display, including the world-famous "The Great Wave off Kanagawa" by details that are barely visible in the original works can be clearly seen. In just one visit, young people can learn to understand and love art through this high-tech experience.
